

7 February 1922

Prof. Ernest Wilde, Esq.
Department of Botany
University of London

Dr. Wilde:

I understand that this letter comes to you without much explanation, but I must warn you. I fear that your life and your work, like mine, are in danger. Over the last several months, a mysterious group of individuals have taken an interest in my research and have been following my movements and impeding my progress. I now have reason to believe that they may threaten my life. As disparate as our fields of study are, I know now that your research and mine are connected, and so you are also in the same danger that I am. I urge you to be cautious, and to guard your research carefully.

I apologize for the lack of detail, but I am already taking a serious risk by sending this letter. I ask you to trust me for the time being. When I am more certain of my safety, I will send you another letter, and we can further discuss the matter. Regretfully, I have not yet had the chance to meet you in person; if and when the danger is evaded, we can meet and I will explain everything.

Be safe, and best of luck,

Emundr Ragnarsson
Oxford University